

Juice sales getting squeezed by healthier choices

By Vanessa Wong, Bloomberg

Americans may be trading in soda for healthier alternatives, but it seems like juice isn't one of them. Per-capita juice consumption in the U.S. dropped to 35.5 liters last year, from 39.9 liters in 2007, according to researcher Euromonitor International. It's a complication for beverage makers looking for ways to make up for slowing soda sales.

Juice has been something of a bright spot this year for Coca-Cola, the largest juice and juice drink producer in the U.S. The company reported Tuesday that juice sales by volume in North America were up 4 percent from July to September, including a 7 percent increase for its fast-growing brand, Simply. On Wednesday, No. 2 juice maker PepsiCo reported share gains in chilled juice and strong performance by its new Tropicana Farmstand fruit-and-veggie drinks.

Considering the larger trend, however, it's unclear how long this momentum can be sustained. Retail juice sales in the U.S. shrank 7.2 percent from 2007, to 9 billion liters last year, according to Euromonitor. Recent data show that sales of orange juice, the most popular, are now at their lowest level in 15 years.

Read the whole story