

Deaths in Nevada linked to flu

By Angela Chen, KOL0-TV

The Nevada Division of Public and Behavioral Health confirms there have been recent deaths in Nevada and around the nation associated with severe complications of the flu.

However, Center for Disease Control and Prevention officials say it's not a severe outbreak here and that this flu season is typical.

They also said that while the activity is currently considered low in the United States, it's also important to know that the incidence of cases is likely to peak in February.
