

What to do with leftover Champagne

By Jillian Eugenios, CNNMoney

Here's the thing about Champagne: It's only good for drinking when it's freshly opened, cold and sparkling in its glass. If the New Year's Eve celebration got a little out of hand, and you have some opened bottles that lasted longer than your guests, fear not: There are still plenty of delicious ways to keep the party going.

Channel Marilyn Monroe, who was rumored to bathe in 350 bottles of bubbly, taking advantage of the grape's naturally-occurring antioxidants.

But if you don't have a few hundred bottles to spare, use a sip's worth for a natural toner. Michelle Phan, makeup artist and YouTube star, promises it will be "light, cool and refreshing."

She wrote on her website, "Champagne is a favorite toner of mine for its detoxifying properties and its ability to fight free radicals."

According to Phan, the acid also helps to even out skin tone. She suggests putting a small amount on a cotton pad and wiping it across the face.
