Dental health critical at an early age

By Rob Oldham

It's a common misconception that baby teeth don't matter much – after all, they're just going to fall out anyway, right?

But the science is firm: Baby teeth are not expendable, and they have many more roles beyond “holding space” for permanent teeth.

Rob Oldham

Proper care of your child’s baby teeth can help their self-esteem, aid in speech development and promote good nutrition because they’ll be able to chew properly. Tooth decay in infants and toddlers can have a terrible impact on them later in life. Pain and infection can interrupt learning, playing and growing.

It’s also great to model proper oral health practices for kids starting at an early age.

I know, I know – brushing your child’s teeth sounds about as fun as getting your own teeth drilled. But there are some tricks that can help. With babies, you can lay them in your lap with their head facing you. Or, try the two-parent, knee-to-knee configuration. With toddlers, model how fun it is to brush your teeth with games or songs. Usually you’ll need to help children brush until age 7 or 8 as they don’t have the dexterity to reach all of their teeth and do a thorough job.

Many parents aren’t aware that you can begin flossing children’s teeth as soon as teeth begin to touch. There are fun, child-friendly “flossers” available in most stores that are easier to use with young children than regular floss.

My youngest, Odette, is 15 months old and loves to brush her teeth. She’ll walk around the house showing off her toothbrush. But she's a rarity – my other kids weren't nearly as receptive. It can be a challenge, but it's important. We established a “bottle, book, brush, bed” routine with our kids, as it's important that they brush after having a bottle. Once those habits are cemented in, it becomes a lot easier.

Another thing I get a lot of questions about is fluoride. It's been the subject of debate over the years, but we now recommend it in appropriate quantities for young children. In fact, as soon as your child's first teeth come in, a dentist can apply a varnish to protect them. Don't overdo the fluoride, though. Keep an eye on toddlers if they're brushing their own teeth to make sure they only use a pea-sized amount of toothpaste, but that they're brushing thoroughly.

Even before children grow teeth, though, it's good practice to rub their gums with a washcloth to keep bacteria from building up. And don't share items with your children that have been in or touched your mouth, such as cups, utensils and toothbrushes, since cavity-producing bacteria can be transferred this way.

Many people are surprised to learn that we now recommend children have their first dental appointment when they get their first tooth, or at their first birthday – whichever comes first. There are even dentists who specialize in pediatric care, if your child is fussy.

When it all comes down to it, just remember: It's never too early.

Memory subject of talk in Incline Village

Charan Ranganath, director of the UC Davis Memory and Plasticity Program and professor of psychology, on Jan. 18 will be talking about the cutting-edge of human memory research.

Recent discoveries in neuroscience have revealed significant insights into how people remember and how to remember better. Evidence shows that the very act of remembering can sometimes help retain information with important discoveries about why this happens. Research also shows the surprising ways that motivation and curiosity can influence memory.

The program will begin at 6pm, with refreshments and no-host bar from 5:30-6pm at TERC on the campus of Sierra Nevada College in Incline Village.

Pre-registration is encouraged. A $5 suggested donation will be collected at the door.

SLT hospital retains trauma center designation

By Cate Neal

Barton Memorial Hospital is one of four designated Level III trauma centers in California, and the only trauma center in the Lake Tahoe, Truckee, and Carson Valley regions.

Recently, Barton Hospital was recertified as a Level III trauma center.

Below are six ways this designation strengthens health care in South Tahoe.

1. Trauma care starts when the paramedics arrive. Unlike other hospital facilities, trauma team members (emergency medicine physicians, surgeons, nurses, and lab and X-ray technicians) and facilities (operating rooms and life support equipment) are available 24-hours a day.

2. A trauma center guarantees a team approach to trauma. The trauma team can quickly move a patient through diagnosis and treatment. Personnel work together from arrival through rehabilitation and discharge.

3. Thirty percent of Barton's emergency visits are trauma-related, illustrating a high community need for trauma services.

4. Injury prevention programs are incorporated into a trauma patient's treatment plan. Examples: concussion awareness, alcohol prevention outreach, and physical therapy.

5. A trauma center can help reduce life-threatening incidents. Tools like a personalized follow-up plan and community outreach can decrease the number of injuries.

6. Trauma designation is a choice; the hospital must seek it out and earn it. Verified Level III trauma centers meet more than 160 specific criteria established by the American College of Surgeons and Committee on Trauma. Designations require verification visits, education requirements, and a certification procedure.

Cate Neal is a registered nurse and the the trauma program coordinator at Barton Memorial Hospital.

Tipping not the norm for hotel housekeepers

By Tammy La Gorce, New York Times

The tip does not have to be big – $1 to $5, says the American Hotel and Lodging Association. But less than a third of hotel guests leave any money for the housekeepers.

The hotel association publishes a gratuity guide on its website that offers suggestions for tipping everyone from valet attendants to bellhops.

But why are housekeepers often forgotten? A common explanation is that they are out of sight – that travelers are likely to tip only employees they directly interact with. But another cause may be a simple lack of awareness.
